READY FOR BUSINESS.

GINNING.

We are now prepared to gin cotton at $1.25 per bale of 500 pounds. Our ginning being complete in every respect enables us to gin and pack cotton with but little expenditure of time and labor on the part of our customers.

COTTON SEED.

We are also ready to buy cotton seed at the highest market price, or take them in exchange for meal or hulls or both. Any one living within a reasonable distance of an oil mill will find it profitable to use meal as a fertilizer instead of the whole seed, or, what is better to feed the meal mixed with hulls or other roughness to stock and apply the manure to the land. In an address on "Intensive Farming", delivered at Red Springs, N. C., August 20, Congressman Stockhouse said: "Cotton seed meal is now the cheapest ammoniated fertilizer on the market, but I am persuaded that the time is not far distant when the entire output of the mills will be utilized as stock food. While too rich to be fed to horses, mules and hogs, as we get it from the mills, it can be mixed with rough food, and thereby overcome that objection, and it will then be relatively much cheaper than corn meal as stock food." That cotton seed meal is one of the most concentrated and valuable stock foods, the following table giving the relative flesh and fat producing qualities of several feed stuffs will show:

Feed.	Flesh.	Fat.
Potatoes.....	3	16
Hay (good).....	5	50
Rye.....	11	73
Oats.....	12	68
Corn.....	12	68
Cotton seed meal.....	41	77

We earnestly solicit that a fair trial be made in feeding cotton seed meal to stock, as that is the proper and most profitable way to utilize this valuable home product. Again, the oil has no fertilizing value. Dr. Dabney, Chemist, Experiment Station, N. C., says: "The oil [of cotton seed] is composed of the chemical elements, carbon, hydrogen and oxygen combined together in a very complicated arrangement. A different arrangement of these same elements would form ordinary sugar, a piece of cloth, or a drink of whiskey. All three of these elements are found in abundance, both above and below the surface of the ground. The cotton plant has the power in its growth of taking up these elements through the pores of the air and through the stalk and the oil of the seed. The carbon comes almost entirely from the air, the hydrogen and oxygen (mainly in the form of water) from both air and soil, and consequently neither can be said to have any fertilizing property, either alone or combined to form the oil."

Many chemical elements unite in various proportions to contribute to plant growth and development; and of these elements agricultural chemists and experimenters have found that nature furnishes in abundance in most soils all except nitrogen, phosphorus and potassium. Now, when the oil and lint are removed from cotton seed, these three elements are found to be contained in the meal and hulls—the meal (about 700 lbs.) containing practically all of them, that is all of the fertilizing properties of the seed. The lint is composed of carbon, hydrogen and oxygen, and so is the oil formed of these same elements only differently combined. Therefore there is just as much reason for disposing of the oil as of the lint. The only question (which can be easily decided by a little calculation) for the farmer to consider is whether he can sell or exchange his seed and get back in another form all or more than all of the elements of fertilization they contain. This oil is being put to various uses in the arts and as an article of diet is being gradually substituted for olive oil and lard on account of its cheapness and equal purity. Therefore there is a constant demand for it, and every gallon of it that can be expressed and sold for more than the cost of production enhances the value of the cotton crop and contributes to the wealth and prosperity of our country. Respectfully,
